

Death of England: Delroy's Modern Morality Play Explores Identity, Grief, and the Weight of History

Death of England is a powerful modern play by Clint Dyer and Roy Williams that explores themes of identity, grief, and the weight of history. The play follows Delroy, a young black man who is struggling to come to terms with his own identity in the wake of his father's death. Delroy's father was a Windrush generation immigrant who came to England from Jamaica in the 1950s. He worked hard all his life, but he never felt like he truly belonged in England. Delroy is determined to find out more about his father's life and to understand the reasons why he felt so alienated.
