Part I: The Email Scandal

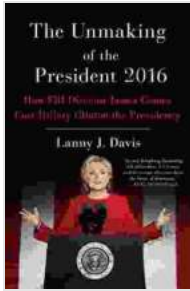

In the lead-up to the 2016 presidential election, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) was investigating Hillary Clinton's use of a private email server while she was Secretary of State. On July 5, 2016, FBI Director James Comey announced that the FBI had completed its investigation and would not recommend criminal charges against Clinton. However, Comey also said that Clinton had been "extremely careless" in her handling of classified information.

This announcement was seen by many as a major blow to Clinton's campaign. Comey's statement came just 11 days before the Democratic National Convention, and it raised questions about Clinton's judgment and trustworthiness.

On October 28, 2016, just 11 days before the election, Comey sent a letter to Congress announcing that the FBI was reopening its investigation into Clinton's emails. This announcement sent shockwaves through the political world and raised new questions about Clinton's judgment and trustworthiness.
